Office for ADR holds National Consultative Conference

By Salvador S. Panga, Jr.

PDRCI President Victor Lazatin speaks on commercial arbitration in the Philippines during the OADR forum. Behind him are OADR Executive Director Bernadette Ongoco, Asian Development Bank specialist Mohd Sani Mohd Ismail, and PDRCI Secretary General Salvador Panga, Jr.

The Office for Alternative Dispute Resolution (OADR), which was established in December 2009 pursuant to Republic Act 9285 (the ADR Act of 2004), hosted the National Consultative Conference on ADR on July 28, 2010 at the Bayview Park Hotel in Manila.

The conference was organized to allow OADR to obtain baseline data on the nature, extent and quality of all current ADR activities in the Philippines, and the diversity of situations and circumstances under which they are practiced; identify priority areas and sectors for development and engagement; and engage the ADR community in a conversation on the best ways by which the OADR can provide meaningful and effective assistance to its constituents.

Over 150 participants from approximately 50 private organizations, educational institutions and government agencies attended the conference. The participating organizations included those involved in the study, administration, management, or conduct of ADR activities, as well as government agencies or institutions exercising quasi-judicial functions that have

Commercial Arbitration: A Preferred Alternative to Litigation

By: Eduardo R. Ceniza

In Part 1 of his article, Atty. Ceniza discussed some of the important reasons why arbitration, in the Philippine setting, ought to be a preferable, if not an altogether compelling choice, as against court litigation, for the resolution of commercial disputes. Among the reasons he cited were (a) speed and economy; and (b) special competence of arbitrators. He discusses the other important reasons in Part 2 of his article.

Neutrality and Party Autonomy

Another advantage of arbitration over court litigation is that in arbitral proceedings, parties can place themselves on an equal footing in at least five key respects. The parties are free to choose the (a) place of arbitration, e.g., it can take place in any city in the Philippines or elsewhere; (b) procedures or rules of law to be applied; (d) nationality of the arbitrators, e.g., in PDRCI there are Filipino and foreign accredited arbitrators; and (e) legal representation, e.g., the parties can be represented by Filipino or foreign lawyers.

In contrast, these key factors are not within the control of the parties in court litigation. In the Philippines, venue is generally fixed by the Rules of Court; the proceedings are governed by the Rules of Court; all judges must be Filipino citizens; and only lawyers who are Filipino citizens and who have been admitted to the practice of law in the Philippines can represent the parties in court.

Final, binding decisions

Although parties to commercial transactions have a number of options for resolving their disputes, only litigation and arbitration can provide a binding and enforceable decision. However, unlike the decisions made by trial courts, arbitral awards are usually not subject to appeal at different levels and become final and binding on the parties once rendered by the arbitral tribunal and confirmed by the courts. As pointed out above, one major cause for undue delay in the disposition of cases in the Philippines is the availability of interminable appeals, often frivolous, at various levels of the hierarchy of courts.

Arbitral awards may be challenged in either the country where the arbitral award is made or where enforcement is sought, but the grounds for challenging arbitral awards are very limited. In contrast, decisions of trial courts are appealable on broad questions of fact or law or both.

International recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards

International commercial arbitration is traditionally hailed as affording the most substantial benefit of producing an award that, in the overwhelming majority of cases, is entitled to recognition and enforcement in 134 countries that have acceded to the New York Convention of 1958. This regime of almost universal recognition and enforcement compares favorably with that regulating the recognition and enforcement of judgments rendered by foreign courts. Those judgments are recognized and enforced only when domestic law or a relevant treaty so provides

The general rule prevailing in civil law systems is that foreign judgments are not recognized or enforced at all or on a basis of reciprocity, with frequent uncertainty as to what form of reciprocity is required. In common law countries, foreign judgments are generally recognized and enforced, but courts retain a significant measure of leeway. European countries have adopted a regional recognition and enforcement scheme laid down in the Brussels Convention, as amended by the Lugano Convention. Generally, however, the liberality in the recognition and enforcement of international arbitral awards prescribed by the New York Convention stands in mark contrast to the uncertain fate that awaits foreign judgments in domestic courts.

Private and confidentiality

Arbitration proceedings are not open to the public, and only the parties themselves receive copies of the award. The parties can expect to keep their trade secrets private from third parties. In contrast, court proceedings are open to the public, and court records are public records.

Institutional arbitration in the Philippines

Institutional arbitration in the Philippines can be either under the ICC International Court of Arbitration or the Philippine Dispute Resolution Center, Inc. (PDRCI). A third arbitral institution is the Construction Industry Arbitration Commission (CIAC), the jurisdiction of which, however, is limited to arbitration of disputes involving construction contracts in the Philippines.

Institutional arbitration is the one in which the proceedings are administered and conducted by an arbitral institution under its pre-established set of rules, while an ad hoc arbitration is constructed by the parties with rules created solely for that specific case. In ad hoc arbitration the parties are "on their own" for all the aspects of the case, they must solve the problem of appointing the arbitrators, addressing issues like "objections, compensation, hearing arrangements and award procurement."

Advantages of institutional arbitration

- Availability of pre-established rules and procedures;
- Administrative assistance from institutions with a secretariat;
- Lists of experienced arbitrators, often listed by fields of expertise;
- Appointment of arbitrators by the institution if the parties request it;
- Physical facilities and support services for arbitrations;
- Assistance in encouraging reluctant parties to proceed with arbitration; and,
-An established format that has proven workable in prior disputes.

Commentators usually prefer institutional arbitration under most circumstances, arbitral institutions playing a major role in the effectiveness of international and domestic commercial arbitration, by an efficient processing of the cases submitted to them and by assuring impartial administrative services to the parties. Therefore, since very often even ad hoc arbitration requires the application of institutionally promulgated rules of procedure, parties are well advised to opt for institutional arbitration rather than ad hoc.

Different combinations between purely ad hoc and institutional arbitration also exist, such as parties appointing the arbitrators but choosing the applicability of a particular arbitral institution, without giving any function to that institution; or parties choosing an institution to administer their proceeding but excluding the applicability of part of the rules of that institution; or parties mandating an arbitral institution only to appoint the arbitrators. These constructions, although some kind of hybrids between clearly ad hoc or institutional arbitration, are usually considered as being ad hoc proceedings and hereinafter will be treated as such, because they serve only a particular case and are established for the purpose of a single proceeding.

Risks of ad hoc arbitration

A leading authority defined ad hoc arbitration "in its purest sense ... (as) a complete agreement between the parties with respect to all aspects of the arbitration, including the law which will be applied, the rules under which the arbitration will be carried out, the method for the selection of the arbitrator, the place where the arbitration will be held, the language, and finally, and most importantly, the scope and issues to be resolved by means of arbitration."

The biggest risk of ad hoc arbitration in the absence of an applicable set of pre-established rules is that lack of party cooperation may easily disrupt the proceeding. The parties can adopt their own set of rules for that particular dispute either by creating new rules and inserting them in the arbitration agreement or by referring to some pre-existing set of rules elaborated by an arbitral institution or by an international organization, such as UNCITRAL or CPR. They may also mandate the arbitral tribunal to decide on the rules as it may consider when the dispute arises. All these prospects assure great flexibility but bring potential complications in the proceeding at the same time. Difficulties usually arise at the moment when one of the parties, otherwise very cooperative at the moment of drafting a liberal ad hoc arbitration clause, later acts in bad faith and refuses to carry out the agreement.

PDRCI: A modern arbitral center

PDRCI has adopted as its own rules the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules with some modifications to make the rules conform with the ADR Act of 2004. Most arbitrators and arbitration lawyers in the Philippines and abroad are familiar with the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules.

The following are some of the good reasons why the business community may have their commercial disputes resolved by arbitration under the auspices of PDRCI.

The Philippine Dispute Resolution Center is a modern arbitration institution for international and domestic commercial arbitration. It's roster of members include retired justices and judges, prominent lawyers, distinguished professors of law, prominent engineers, architects, accountants and contractors.

- It has a panel of accredited arbitrators, both local and foreign.

- PDRCI is highly regarded in the Asia Pacific region. It is a founding member of the Asia Pacific Regional Arbitration Group (APRAG), which is composed of 23 leading arbitration centers or institutions in the Asia Pacific region. Some PDRCI members are accredited arbitrators of Singapore International Arbitration Center and the International Arbitration Center of Malaysia.

-PDRCI can provide parties with administrative and physical facilities for arbitration proceedings, including an experienced secretariat, meetings rooms and the use of computers, fax machines, photocopying machines, etc.

- PDRCI's administrative fees as well as arbitrators' fees are very reasonable. Compared with the fees charged by the ICC International Court of Arbitration and those charged by regional arbitral institutions in South Korea, Malaysia, Singapore and Hong Kong, PDRCI's fees are very much lower.

Domestic parties in commercial disputes need not go abroad for the settlement of their disputes by arbitration. Commercial arbitration, both domestic and international, is available in the Philippines at less cost and with the assurance that all required facilities are conveniently available.

PROBLEMS IN ADR

Choosing the arbitral tribunal

By Roberto N. Dio

In a lecture that he gave during the recent International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) workshop on international commercial arbitration held on July 2 to 4, 2010 in Hong Kong, former International Court of Arbitration Secretary General Yves Derains shared his views on the factors parties should consider in choosing and selecting the arbitral tribunal.

First, he said, is the value and complexity of the claim. If the value of the claim is substantial and the issues involved are complex, then a tribunal of three arbitrators is better than a sole arbitrator.

Second is speed. A tribunal of three tends to be slower than a sole arbitrator.

Third is the common misunderstanding by parties that the arbitrator will be a champion of the party nominating him. The arbitrator, Yves stressed, is independent and neutral. Hence, it would be useless to appoint someone in the expectation that he would be an advocate or friendly to a party's cause.

Fourth is the arbitrator's availability, which is very important. The party should inform the nominee arbitrator when the arbitration will be filed so he will be available to join the tribunal. It will be futile to nominate an arbitrator who is so busy that he will only decline the nomination.

Fifth is the freedom from bias of an arbitrator. The party should find an arbitrator who has no predilection or antipathy to a certain country, views or legal issues. He cites as an example the tendency of lawyers trained in the common law to prefer a strict interpretation of the law, compared to those trained in the civil law system who are open to interpretation.

Sixth is the choice of the chairman of the tribunal. It is best to leave the choice to the two nominees, who will normally have a short list of their preference as chairperson. The ideal chairman should be decisive, able to decide especially within the hearing. He should be able to decide "rightly and correctly on the spot," according to Yves.

Seventh is the disclosure of conflicting interest. The party should discuss with the nominee any potential conflict to avoid delay in constituting the tribunal. Ideally, one should appoint an arbitrator who has nothing to disclose or has only a minimal disclosure to make.

Eight is the interview with the arbitrator. If a party has to interview an arbitrator prior to nominating him, the interview has to be limited. This is commonly done in the United States, observed Yves, but the ICC has no specific practice guidelines on the contact between a party and an arbitrator prior to his appointment but the arbitrator will have to disclose the interview. Do not discuss the merits of the case during the interview.

The ideal chairman should be decisive, able to decide especially within the hearing.

During the open forum, a question was asked if it would be appropriate for a party or law firm to nominate the same arbitrator in several cases. Yves replied that while an arbitrator should not allow himself to be a "regular" nominee of a party or a law firm, it also depends on the size of the firm and the size of the jurisdiction. In a small jurisdiction, observed another speaker during the forum, it is inevitable that only a few arbitrators will be chosen. However, it will be unusual for an international law firm to regularly nominate the same arbitrator in a big jurisdiction such as the United States.
